Stem cell therapy using bone marrow mononuclear cells (BMMCs) is one of the potential treatments for ischemic diseases. However, the clinical application of such cells is still limited because of ethical concerns about the collection of bone marrow, and the inadequate number of cells obtained from bone marrow. To overcome these problems, we examined the feasibility of using stem cells from human adipose tissue (ATMCs), which can be easily collected from the subcutaneous fat tissue of patients, as a cell source for cell therapy.
