In order to maintain self-renewal and homeostasis of adult tissues, mechanisms must exist to prevent proliferation of cells that lack a normal complement of stem cell factors. We have previously shown that the p19(ARF) protein is such a tumor suppressor in the hematopoietic system. In studies presented in this paper, we show that p19(ARF) is also required for complete tumor suppression in other cell types. This is evidenced by the finding that ectopic expression of p19(ARF) leads to an inhibition of the growth of transformed epithelial cell lines. In contrast to the hematopoietic system, in these cells p19(ARF) does not appear to be involved in the down-regulation of cyclin D/cdk complexes. In addition, p19(ARF)-deficient fibroblasts are not able to activate wild-type p53. These results identify p19(ARF) as a potent tumor suppressor protein that is required not only for the self-renewal of adult tissues but also for complete tumor suppression.The role of the spin-orbit coupling constant B in electron and hole concentration and charge rearrangement in semiconductor nanocrystals. An exact and simple theoretical model is given in order to analyze the role of the spin-orbit coupling constant B in the electron and hole concentration and charge rearrangement in nanocrystalline semiconductors. The model is used for interpretation of data obtained in a recent electron paramagnetic resonance and photoluminescence study on CdSe nanoparticles. The model takes into account the important interactions between the conduction band states, the valence band states, and phonons of the host matrix, in contrast to previous studies in which the interactions between the valence band and con 3e33713323
