Andreas von Bulow, Former German Minister In other news, with the political climate in the EU still heated up, the Euro zone needs to not only strengthen its financial regulation, but its also needs to regain the confidence of its citizens that the Euro is a stable currency. The ECB has to do what it does best; bail out the banks in trouble. This time around it's a huge potential threat to financial stability. The Bundesbank has performed with exellency in the past, preserving the value of the mark and as a result profiting from large fines it gained from bank law violations. The Bundesbank is a well respected pillar in the Euro zone; by stabilising the central bank the euro can be protected from too much speculation. One of the biggest problems is that Eurozone officials do not agree on which emergency steps need to be taken to deal with the fallout of the sovereign debt crisis. Some countries are more worried about Greece's debt burden than others. For example, Germany and the Netherlands would be most concerned about contagion risks, whereas Italy would
