Category:Portable softwareFor some reason this has evaded me for far too long. I was pleasantly surprised when I saw that there was something at Carleton that was called Monveys. I tried a search of the internet but couldn't find anything on it. I was pleasantly surprised to see that it was an academic website - so I figured I would come along and read through. Anyway, Monveys is a website that provides a platform for researchers to share their results and is run by Monash University and the Claremont Colleges. While I was reading through, I was a bit daunted because the level of refinement of the website didn't match the sophistication of the subject matter. However, as I went on, I found the content to be very interesting and the editor had done a fantastic job in choosing relevant research and referencing. I found the abstracts very interesting and thought provoking (although more in line with my research). I used the search functionality to find the article that I was interested in. There was a low turnover of articles in the database, with some of them being very old. The topics covered by the database were diverse: some focused on the health impacts of the environment, others specifically on climate change and one touched on the emotional impact of climate change. Monveys still, I think, provides a platform for researchers to share their results. I have found the methods and results section of the articles to be very useful and have found the discussions and comments section very useful when trying to seek out expert opinion from renowned researchers. I've only been a user of Monveys for about a year and a half, but I will definitely look to Monveys for my research needs moving forward. The more negative aspects of Monveys were its overall registration process and the amount of basic information that was required to access everything.
