Toyota Says Prius Plug-in No Longer Gets Green Light For Hydrogen Fuel Toyota's plug-in hybrid Prius has become the first electric car to be excluded from sales in Europe, due to uncertainty about its hydrogen production. The Prius Plug-in uses a small motor to recharge the car's battery while drawing electricity from the grid during periods when the car is stationary. It can travel about 60 kilometres (37 miles) on battery alone and, thanks to the kinetic energy of its brakes, can run for a further 5 kilometres (3 miles) on a charge, before switching on the car's internal combustion engine. Toyota this summer announced it was considering setting up a hydrogen filling station in Cologne, Germany, and announced the car for sale. But the company has now said it will not be selling it in the country, due to the risks involved in producing the fuel. In a statement, European sales chief John Hanson said: Hydrogen filling stations are currently being tested across Europe. However, the local infrastructure required to produce, store, transport and dispense the fuel is yet to be established. There is currently no network of hydrogen refilling stations in Europe and 3e33713323
