Next story in Politics Video: Fast food habits a risky diet
WASHINGTON — Richard Jensen is a college-educated, sensible guy. He works in the government, lives in a high-rise and eats healthfully. But get him talking about the D.C. area's fast-food culture and he drops his guard. "I would like to spend more time in the land of caffeine and fat-filled," the Washington area resident said recently. "I wouldn't want to spend all my time in the suburbs where I don't have a seat in the park to walk the dog." Suburbs have become known as the "epidemic" of obesity, an epidemic that affects every age group and seems to be getting worse, according to a study released Wednesday. One of every three people in the nation's suburbs is now overweight or obese, the study by the Trust for America's Health found. And what's more, the obesity rate is highest among people ages 50 to 64, the study showed. The most common diet changes, however, were unhealthy. When asked about their diet,

45 percent of non-Hispanic whites said they had "added" a fast food meal, like a hamburger, to their regular diet since 1999, according to a new survey by the Trust for America's Health. Other common changes: More meals eaten at home than eating out, and eating at fast food or a sit-down restaurant less often. For Jensen, the health care expert in the federal government, the drive to the fast food restaurants has become a problem. "I pretty much avoid them. The kids don't want to go, and I just don't want
