On June 11, the province of British Columbia gave Kinder Morgan Inc. an injunction to halt construction on the Trans Mountain pipeline expansion. In what's been widely viewed as a blow to Kinder Morgan's plans to build the expansion, the company and the federal government were effectively banned from proceeding with the project. According to the B.C. Court of Appeal, a mere 14-day shutdown would only cost Kinder Morgan $82,000. The decision to shut down construction was a natural result of the court's ruling. The ruling also has major implications for Kinder Morgan's shareholders and associates, after the Alberta-based company agreed to a deal to sell Trans Mountain to the federal government for $4.5 billion in 2017. Getting a measure of relief By suspending Trans Mountain's expansion, the B.C. court deemed that Kinder Morgan's $4.5-billion acquisition of the project would be impossible to complete. The ruling has sent a strong message to the federal government: don't even think about selling Trans Mountain to Kinder Morgan. Shares in Kinder Morgan took a hit the day after the ruling was announced. The company's stock price was already
