We produce items in substantial numbers and cannot afford the slowdowns that come from a lot of simultaneous appends. -- We also use a limited number of servers and need to be able to upgrade them without taking the servers offline as the app and DB grow. Also, I'm not sure whether clear_results should be a class variable. We are using class constants rather than class variables for a number of reasons: * we can easily reset them in our unit tests * the setting can be overridden in the setting module * the number is configurable -- My two thoughts: 1. As a consequence of #1, am I guaranteed (with our current infrastructure) that I will always have one group count with filters? 2. What is the use case for using classes with globals? What I think: I think you can safely say that in current process we have at most some 50 groups. If there's a reasonable point to class constants for group count. Other thoughts: I don't think there's a public API for it yet. So group count would have to be stored somewhere else. -- This ticket has been posted through the Forums on SourceForge.net: Keywords: Data Studio Select a news: Differentiation When using SQLDataSource, how can I set the server name depending on the platform? Early life stress potentiates the behavioral effects of cocaine in a rat model of childhood attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder. Abnormalities in stress reactivity have been documented in children with childhood-onset attention-deficit hyperactivity disorder (ADHD). Recently, children with ADHD have shown greater abnormalities in multiple elements of the stress response (hippocampal expression of corticotropin-releasing hormone [CRH] and FK506 binding protein [FKBP-1] mRNA) compared with healthy age-matched children. The purpose of the current study was to determine whether this pattern of altered stress reactivity is also evident in adult ADHD. Adult female Sprague-Dawley rats were tested in the open field for the effects of either maternal separation (MS) or a novel environmental condition (NC) on drug-induced locomotion. All stress conditions resulted in an increase in locomotor activity. For both stress conditions, acute in vivo challenge with cocaine (0.5 mg/kg i.p.) potentiated the locomotor response on the following day. In vitro challenges with the dopamine transporter blocker GBR-12909 (1 microM) and the norepinephrine transporter blocker desipramine (10 microM) also potentiated locomotor activity in the MS group. These potentiating effects on locomotor activity were most pronounced in the group that received both MS and cocaine. Potentiating effects of cocaine and GBR-12909 on locomotor activity in the NC group were similar to those observed in the MS group. Thus, stress in early life appears to promote the effects of cocaine in adulthood, possibly through an alteration in stress reactivity.The Belgian version of the SF-36 Health Survey (SF-36-BV) as a measure of outcome in conservative treatment of operatively treated ankle fractures. The SF-36-BV was developed as a measure of outcome in the field of orthopedics and orthopedic surgery. To assess the criterion- and convergent validity of the SF-36-BV as a measure of outcome in conservative treatment of operatively treated ankle fractures. Prospective multicentre study. Data were analysed on 204 patients with a first ankle fracture who were treated conservatively and followed for at least 12 months after trauma. All patients completed the SF-36-BV and the AOFAS Ankle-Hindfoot Scale (AHS) 6 weeks postoperatively. For most of the SF-36-BV scales
