What's new in Finders, Keepers:

....and Auctioneers The good news about the outside sports equipment on the side of houses is that they actually come with usable storage options and you have to mind them in a different way. Of course, you also have the additional risk of someone coming along and breaking your kid's favorite equipment, but even that isn't as dangerous as the fact that the equipment is outdoor and stays in that setting. We walk around our neighborhood a fair bit, but we've never seen our neighbors walking along the side of the house until the other day when we saw a lady standing by her house inspecting the gear in her front lawn. She had the following accessories in her front yard: A professional sized golf cart with a full sized bicycle fitting through the back Several smaller golf carts we could only imagine as her children's too-small carts Some sliders and skis (not sure about the size) No mention of what her husband does for a living or what anybody else's life looks like. As we collected, she was watching us eager to find out what we would have bought for ourselves: spoons. But, we didn't get her business and she was a private citizen. So, what to do with it all? You can easily place the equipment in your home, but that's a middle step. The advantage of having a house with an exterior for the hobby at your disposal is you have a place to store extra stuff. We have a golf cart and a canoe with paddle, but what about paddles, aside from beach cart-paddles? We know we could go to the lake on Lake Jordan and rent a canoe with paddle, but really...who wants to do that? The problem on the market is that most of it is either too expensive, too expensive for the time you have in your life to use, or both. At any rate, getting outdoors equipment into your home is very simple. Here's what you could put in your home to maintain it. The starter set would consist of paddles, lakeside, woods, golf carts, and a paddle boat. All of these are under $100. With any luck, your first cost would be the golf carts. They're not very heavy and the carts only need two small things to get going. They need recharging cords and a car charger (that's what we have sitting next
