What's new:

Chapter 4 Strategy So far I have spent half of the book talking about exploration. In Chapter 2 we talked about best strategy in exploring. This chapter is all about best strategy in combat. We will introduce rules that lead us to develop a best strategy in combat. This chapter is divided into two sections. There is a section on one on one combats with similar experience. These are more oriented towards multi team battles. The other part of the chapter is all about conquest and defense strategy against AI. This section consists of two sections. The first one is about ww1t. The second part is about strategy for multiplayer games like Fallout: New Vegas. There is a space for notes, but none were included. We will not discuss general strategy against AI in multiplayer battle if it is clear frm the context that we understand the players and their operations. One on one battles are what most of us will experience. This section will explain how to combat basic raids. We will talk about a bit about the composition of a combat team. There is a discussion of how to determine when to retreat. If you will not retreat you will go to (0,0). There is also another discussion on how to calculate hit points for warriors and siege weapons. They will deal with battle formations, like cavalry, and siege strategy. Finally, they will discuss one of the best approaches to a siege weapon. In this chapter we will discuss best strategy in combat. For sure most of the part is born from experience, but we will discuss it systematically. Introduction to combat In a game that has inventory rules we will have wares and prepared food. In the ww1t version these are handled with invulnerable uses. A warrior attacks when he has his combat shield. Usually the shield is used to parry incoming (or outgoing if it is block) attacks. If a warrior is hit that also means he will not have his combat shield in the next turn. The ww1t warrior has a combat shield with him all the time. A siege weapon will need food and a musketeer will need prepared food to prepare a musket. Even food is locally generated. In the ww1t version there is no difference between gold gained and physical rewards. This chapter will also discuss how to generate gold
