In late January, Uber started expanding its 'ridesharing' taxi-like service, called UberX, into New York City. It also introduced it to Boston. Tapping an app can sometimes be easier than hailing a cab. But when Uber was first launched in San Francisco, users didn't immediately see how to arrange an uberX ride. The service is getting a lot more mainstream as more taxis and ridesharing companies join forces and make it easier for consumers to get around. As New York City's city council goes to a vote on a bill allowing ridesharing companies to operate taxicabs, taxis are getting jittery. After several years of listening to the concerns of for-hire vehicle operators, and sticking close to the model followed by taxis in San Francisco, Uber started its most recent operation in Manhattan with a thicket of red tape. UberX - the part of the ride-sharing service used for the taxis - is undergoing testing, but it's far from completely legal. New York City's for-hire vehicle drivers have until about April 1 to register with the Taxi & Limousine Commission. The provision requires that drivers have their own insurance, also known as medallions, and to maintain a good rating on a state database that is used to assess driver quality, among other things. A few cities have already started to crack down on Uber. New York State is considering a bill that would allow Uber and Lyft drivers to operate without the medallions of for-hire vehicles. Massachusetts lawmakers are considering a similar bill. While taxis and ridesharing companies have different ways of playing the game, they appear to be playing by the same rules.
