The purpose of this website is to provide an explanation of all the layers of encryption between the computer, the user, and the remote computing site. This explanation of the security measures is only an educated guess. Simply put, the process starts with a computer. Then the user enters a password. After that, the computer encrypts the password and transmits it to the remote service provider. This is known as Tunneling Over Internet Protocol (Tunneling Over IP). You can also think of it as sending a package in a transport that is more secure than normal. With the information in the package encrypted, or tunneled, it is harder for anyone to intercept the package and read the contents. The remote computing site receives the encrypted package. It decrypts the package and when finished, sends the information back to the user's computer. This process is known as Tunneling Over Internet Protocol (Tunneling Over IP). It is safer to use tunneling than plain old Internet (based) connections. This is because it is possible for someone to intercept a package going from the user to the remote computing site. Then the interceptor intercepts the package on the way back, or at the destination, but it's not possible to do this with Internet based connections. So Tunneling Over Internet Protocol is more secure than Internet based connections. A Man in the Middle Attack could potentially take place in the same fashion, but the difference is that a Man in the Middle Attack could potentially see the contents of the package from the user and send them to the remote site. There are 3 steps to complete the VPN. Each of the steps are based on: Your Operating System (Windows or Apple). The protocol used for the encrypted tunnel. Connection speed. Tunnel Over IP on Windows Machines On a Windows machine, the Tunneling Over Internet Protocol (Tunneling Over IP) is only used by the remote connection and the computer is actually routing the connection through the remote service provider. This might be a problem on a fast connection. However, the speed problem can be solved by also having a firewall rule for the service provider. The firewall rule should not allow data to pass directly from the user to the service provider's computer. The firewall rule should allow the connection from the user to pass through the remote firewall and only the firewall on the service provider should allow the connection. If you are using a Mac, you can use OSX's native IPSec Tunneling with
