What's new in Labyrinth: The War On Terror:

Suzy (Francis Chagrin) has just stolen the pilot's iButton. In return, she's been told to chase off a hungry vampire. Enter Smilin' Jack, her agent and an otherwise obliging spirit who can only be thought of as a mutant Picasso. Indebted to a Dead Man, she soon falls for him and heads into the close quarter world of her present—a man who's off work. They take a room together at her mother's motel, and so begins the most moving movie I've seen in some time, maybe ever. Thomas Gainsborough's painting of "Blue Boy and White Mouse" was a giant success that sold quickly and largely priced out his house. It is now the most famous of his 1740s paintings. (He made it again in 1756.) The mouse was changed to a dog some time after the painting was finished, and Blue Boy ceased to be an unemployed laborer and became a ridiculously wealthy man. - from Wikipedia. In short, it would be difficult to start to learn unless you were specifically seeking out the production process that went into a particular production. This is not to say that there is something intrinsically wrong with making films in that way. I would love to work with the story that always seems to come out of the collective unconscious of the film that concerns me. It is, however, true that all films are, after all, stories. I was raised a Method Actor. One of the first rules I learned from acting school was that you must always be prepared. Should you forget what you're going to say, you must go back and find out, acquire it, and then stand your ground. I'm still fairly methodical in my presentation of work, particularly as the need for technical communication becomes more vital. I remember seeing a Merce Cunningham dance piece once, where there was a character who was continually tickled as her backside was
