garena188500mysql. A: Does the code work fine with Python 3.x? I'm wondering if you're really just passing a string as one of the args or if instead the value you're passing to the -p option is being interpreted as a string. From the ps2 command line reference page you can see:
-p Specifies a port (or range of ports) to open or listen on. Each argument is separated by a comma. The argument may be a regular-expression string, in which case it is scanned for regular expressions. If an argument is a regular expression, a matching port is selected and the value of the `-p` option is set to the matched port(s). The general format of the regular expression argument is `'-pP[,P[,P...]]'`. So it looks like the port might be getting split into two separate args. I think if you actually have something like `ps2 -p -P1337,1338` etc... it would work fine. Have you tried that? But maybe your problem is that the `'.'` is interpreted in the string that you pass to the argument. See if this works (it's untested but at least there should be documentation that shows how args work): `args = ['-p', '-P1337', '-P1338', '-P1339', '-P1340', '-P1341', '-p0:40:40']` That should give you a list with 7 entries. If I do: `for arg in args: print(arg)` I get ['-p', '-P1337', '-P1338', '-P1339', '-P1340', '-P1341', '-p0:40:40'] 1) and the higher level of FI and I-ZR were observed in Mexico than in other regions of Brazil. In addition, the CMO, identified as one of the main axis of this study, assessed the relationship between the antecedents and outcomes of the Food Insecurity and Incomplete Nutritional Zinc Retention. The results indicate that food insecurity was associated with incomplete nutritional zinc retention, which means that some groups of
