RelatedMetal-assisted therapy of ionizing radiation in malignant gliomas. Malignant gliomas comprise a group of highly resistant brain tumors with a median survival of less than two years. In order to overcome the problem of a highly invasive tumor, we have used metal-assisted hyperthermia (MAH) and modulated magnetic fields (MMF) for the treatment of human gliomas in vitro and in vivo. We demonstrate that metal compounds can be used to shield tumor cells against the adverse effects of ionizing radiation. MMF in combination with moderate hyperthermia increased the radiosensitizing effect of gamma irradiation. Neither MMF nor hyperthermia alone had an effect on the viability of tumor cells. However, the combination of MMF and hyperthermia alone significantly increased the radiosensitivity of a number of tumor cell lines in vitro. We also show that the anti-tumor effect of MMF plus hyperthermia is associated with a decrease of tumor blood flow and a regression of tumor size in glioma-bearing nude rats.

Prevalence of stroke in a general population in Hong Kong. A previously used method was modified to determine the prevalence of stroke in a Chinese general population. A total of 840 subjects were randomly selected from 3 electoral subdistricts, and 622 subjects were recalled after one year for verification by questionnaire and interview of their doctor or hospital case files. Prevalence was determined by screening of the group as a whole (358) and by stratifying the group by age and sex. The total prevalence of stroke in Hong Kong was approximately twice as high as that found in a previous survey and the risk increased with advancing age in men and in women.
