Is there a non-JS solution to implement hover effects like bounce, see-through, etc. on a website? Why are all so JS-based anyway, I can't see why it wouldn't be possible without them? A: In simple terms, bounce is done with CSS3 animations. CSS3 animations can also be controlled through JavaScript with the mousemove() function. For example: .foo { animation:foo 1s 1 ease 0; } @keyframes foo { 0% {left: 0} 50% {right: 0} 100% {left: 0} } If you want to add clicking and hovering, you can also add a class that causes the animation to kick in and then remove that class with a click. Have a look here. just on the site. I broke my arm and had to go to the hospital for a couple of days. While on the trip to the hospital, no electronic devices were allowed. I ended up getting pain pills from the pharmacist (Ephos, Percocet, Vicodin, and Oxycontin), and the pain was bad. I had to get IV fluids, which as a vegetarian, it's not something I ever do. Having a remote house with a fridge, a kitchen, a bathroom, and entertainment system means that I don't have to do any of those things. So, on the flip side, I've spent $7k setting up my house with wilderness survival gear, a radio, and a hunting rifle. Next year, I'm probably going to get a satellite TV dish that will have 4-10 times the bandwidth. I can then watch movies 24/7 and still have connectivity. Plus, I can stream high definition television over the internet (without using wireless capability. Of course, if Verizon ever figures out how to get high speed internet to its
