In recent years, color copying and printing techniques have been further advanced to provide high-speed and high-quality color image production by color toners of four to six colors. In recent years, copying and printing machines using a large number of toners for color printing have been developed, and a variety of techniques for forming four-color toner images (four colors of CMY) or six-color toner images (six colors of CMYK) on the surface of a recording material are available. In recent years, techniques for a rranging toners in accordance with the toner arrangement rule (hereinafter, referred to as a "toner arrangement pattern") are available as a technique for achieving higher-quality color printing. According to this technique, a toner image is formed by arranging toners on a print medium in accordance with the toner arrangement rule is defined by the following four conditions: a first condition that a specific toner is arranged in the manner that does not overlap the toner of a specific color is arranged in such a manner that it does not overlap the toner of a specific color is arranged in such a manner that it does not overlap the toner of the another color; and a fourth condition that, when a distance between a toner of another color does not overlap the toner of the another color does not overlap the toner of the another color; a third condition that, when a distance between a toner of another color does not overlap the toner of the another color; and a fourth condition that, when a distance between a toner of a specific color is arranged in such a manner that it does not overlap the toner of the another color; best than a prescribed d
