Field of the Invention The invention relates to a method of filling a tube, particularly a fuel or lubricant tube, having a cross-section with a smaller cross-sectional dimension relative to its length. In particular, the present invention is directed to a method of filling a tubular member, such as a pipe, with a combination of gas and liquid, to form a gas-liquid composite and the pipe so filled is disposed of as a waste product. 2. Description of the Prior Art Pipes and tubes having small cross-sectional dimensions are relatively readily formed from extruded lengths of pipe or tube material. Other pipes and tubes having a larger cross-section dimension often are not readily formed by extrusion. Such pipes and tubes, however, are often needed for use in various chemical processes, and in particular where gas-liquid flows are employed. Accordingly, it is often not cost-effective or convenient to re-use such pipes and tubes in a second application when they are no longer needed in a first application. Accordingly, it is a general object of the present invention to provide an improved method of treating pipe, tube or similar tubular members which are otherwise no longer needed in a first use. In particular, the present invention may be used to fill a number of single-use tubes with a gas and liquid mixture to form a composite tube. The composite tube is then disposed of as a waste product. In accordance with one aspect of the present invention, a tube having a smaller cross-section relative
