lower sugar corn sweeteners. In recent years, increasing concerns have been raised regarding the safety of certain conventional sugar sweeteners in terms of their impact on obesity and related metabolic disorders. To address this issue, many companies are attempting to find alternative sugar sweeteners, including those with similar taste characteristics to sucrose. A new method for generating sugar sweeteners is based on the reduction of disaccharide oligosaccharides to their corresponding monosaccharide components. Such monosaccharides can then be used to generate the desired sweetener either as free sugars or as their phosphorylated counterparts. In addition, the resulting monosaccharide products have a comparable impact on blood sugar control. This review details some of the current efforts on this process and provides a brief overview
