Platelet concentrates (PC) are routinely stored at room temperature for up to 5 days before transfusion. These PC are known to be contaminated by bacteria which may endanger the recipients. We present a simple and sensitive method to quantify the bacterial contamination of PC. A 5 cm long silicone capillary tube was used. Prior to use, PC were stored at 22 degrees C for up to 3 days or were held for more than 3 days at room temperature. After PC processing, 1 ml PC was aseptically transferred to a 5 cm long silicone capillary tube containing 3 ml saline. To quantify the bacterial contamination, PC were vortexed for 30 sec. then analysed by plate counting in 3 ml saline. By this method, the limit of detection was $2 \times 10(4)$ colony forming units (CFU) per ml PC. Bacterial contamination was observed in 77 of 170 (45%) fresh PC and in 6 of 25 (24%) PC stored at room temperature for more than 3 days. Cultures in 7 PC were negative. For PC stored at room temperature, the median was $3.1 \times 10(4)$ CFU per ml (range $1.5-6.0 \times 10(4)$ CFU/ml). This method has shown the bacterial contamination of PC to be within the suggested limits, and that there are differences between PC of different donors.The Will & Grace crew was reunited and they were giving the best one-liners! Viewers were in for a treat Wednesday night when Will & Grace returned from their one year hiatus. With a smattering of familiar faces,
