At the UN in 2001, the member nations were summoned together and asked to vote on adopting one single anthem for all. It was clear that the choice would be the one composed by Samuel Barber for the UK in 1942, Sinfonia Elegiaca. I have followed the progress of the proposed UN anthem from its origins in 1994 in reference to the United Nations' 50th anniversary, when the work received its first public performance in the UN headquarters building. A project for an independent UK film was launched and several thousand UK citizens signed an open letter to the UN calling for the resolution to be adopted. Also, the MP for Knaresborough, the returner of the 2001 election George Osborne, took a firm position in favour of the measure being adopted. It's not often the pronouncements of a backbencher have any real weight, so I was not surprised to hear this. And so on December 9, 2001 the UN adopted the anthem. However, this was to be a lesson in the importance of legal documents. The legislation had stated that any nation could propose its own anthem for consideration, and so the text of the open letter was formally adopted to become part of the UN's Records of the General Assembly, a document that was then duly amended. The essence of the Sinfonia Elegiaca is that it is a work of consolation, written in commemoration of the dead. Here are the lyrics to the anthem, and its meaning for the Crimean Tatars. african union anthem mp3 downloads The Crimean Tatars were a Turkic people living in the south of the Russian Empire. In 1944 they were forcibly deported to Central Asia (the name Crimean Tatar comes from the Turkish word kırım meaning 'steppe'), and only partly resettled in the Crimea. In 1945, the Crimean Tatars were recognized as an endangered ethnic group by the U.S. The far right Russian state, threatened by this, began a campaign against the Crimeans, accusing them of collaborating with the Nazis and conspiring against the Russian state. In August 1944, the NKVD, the secret police, arrested the brothers Feodosiy and Ivan Pavlovich Tartarovsky, forefathers of the modern leadership of the ethnic group. Fearful that the rest of the Tartarovsky family would be taken away at any time, the brothers decided to escape. Early in 1944 they concealed their brother Antanas, who was due to be deported to a labor camp, in their house. During the night of October 29-30, 1944 the brothers and Antanas escaped from Moscow and crossed the border into Crimea, where the Tartarovsky family eventually found refuge.

I have already described the German anthem in my post the german anthem , and as the song is not the usual patriotic fare, I decided to split it in two. The first part covers the official title of the anthem and much of the first verse, and is quite, quite tricky. It starts with the triple time of the bridge, but soon drops back to the majeur, which is followed by a theme that also returns to the majeur and then alters that to a rondo in the subject of the final verses development. The scherzo employs a scherzo figuration repeated four times in the solo. The topic comes back to the starting rondo theme, and ends with the theme from the bridge transformed into a scherzo head with the new theme returning from the bridge. This is the first anthem I have been able to identify. It is called the Harmonica, as it is the theme of the opening of the harmonica. It is also a cantus firmus for the part with the highest vocal range, a part normally sung by a soloist. The melody is quite simple, the four voice parts jumping up and down in octaves and employing a range of rhythmic and modal phrasing. The work requires a lot of skill, with singers having to be able to switch back and forth between the upper and lower octaves and have plenty of dexterity to get the notes out. In Handel days, this was certainly not an easy task. It is an interesting and ambitious piece, and one that I think Handel would have enjoyed. The anthem O clap your hands is not the typical sort. It has a beautifully melodious opening phrase, but it isn't a Bach style aria. Instead, it's a dance/fantasia for a less musically skilled choir. The piece could have been arranged for an organ, and it is one that would have given Handel a real headache. However, it has an interesting opening section which uses the alternate basses of the choir to suggest a dance. It is very upbeat, and a brilliant piece of music, and one that is well worth the listen. The choir are really up for this one. Indeed, that is, in part, the reason for the inclusion of it in this series. This work was the joint commission of Sidney Sussex College, Cambridge, and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. The original manuscript contains the following words: This Anthem, is by Mr. John Scott, Mr. Christopher Dearnley and Mr. Herbert Walford, who set it for Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where the first performance took place on 4th May, 1905. 5ec8ef588b
