figure 1: (a) estimates of the reproduction number using the first 32 days of the epidemic curve; (b) estimated profiles of the incidence of infection over time for each method and data set. the figure suggests that the sb method fits poorly the data. figure 4: comparison of the estimated reproductive number r using the data (blue line) and simulated data (red line). the simulated data are produced by randomly sampling with replacement the original data set. as in the original data, the reproduction number estimated for the simulated data (r') is very low, suggesting that the real epidemic did not have a large outbreak in the studied period. figure 5: estimates of the reproductive number r using data (blue line) and the simulated data (red line) after randomly sampling the data set. in this setting, the r-squared deviance for the simulated data is always larger than the one obtained for the data, suggesting that the original data set is not representative of the population of mers-cov cases. figure 7: comparison of the estimated reproduction number r using the data (blue line) and simulated data (red line). the simulated data are produced by randomly sampling with replacement the original data set. as in the original data, the reproduction number estimated for the simulated data (r') is very low, suggesting that the real epidemic did not have a large outbreak in the studied period. figure 8: estimates of the reproduction number r using data (blue line) and simulated data (red line) after randomly sampling the data set. in this setting, the r-squared deviance for the simulated data is always larger than the one obtained for the data, suggesting that the original data set is not representative of the population of mers-cov cases.
