Uefa Champions League 2006-07 Game Pc 114

As the Gambino crew amassed its profits, a referee -- this alleged Gambino referee -- continued to pick their games. The ref had all of his gambling friends in the NBA circle; these friends were, in turn, betting against the Gambino crew. And the referees, presumably in cahoots with Donaghy, were rigging those games to push the Gambino crew's bets, which they were betting on the wrong teams.

Finally, in a crucial moment, a crew member made a bad prediction about a match involving the Gambino crew, and all the Gambino team's bets were revealed. As Battista says, "Your classic mafia bust." The Gambino crew member, who had won big on the Gambino crew's picks, was forced to return the lost money to the Gambino crime family. With this information, the mobsters were able to take the necessary next steps: They alerted their friends in other crews who had put down bets on these games, and these new gangs were now on the Gambino crew's rivals list. There was a battle brewing. The Gambino crew also tried to talk the ref -- the Gambino ref -- into backing away from the bets he was making on Donaghy's games. They reportedly turned to their affiliate in the NBA referee's union, who at first was in favor of taking the money, and then, changed his mind. The NBA ref eventually put his cards on the table and asked the Gambino crew for a $100,000 get-out-of-jail-free card. Battista says the Gambino crew now wants the money back. If the FBI arrests the Gambino crew, they will be free of any gambling-related charges, whereas Scala says the league is going to prosecute the Gambino crew criminally.

Then there was Vito. Born in Philadelphia in 1954, it appears Vito was among the earliest victims of Donaghy's predatory gambling on NBA games. He became close friends with Joe Vito, and Battista and Vito were very, very close, too. Vito would come to Boston, where he lived, to run meetings and see Battista in the thick of things. Once or twice, I was at one of Vito's large dining rooms -- complete with chandeliers and frescos -- with Battista and others. A man who was there said that when Vito took over as Battista's boss, Vito got the better of Battista's gambling activity on Donaghy games.

"Vito controlled most of it," the man said. Battista was usually "gambling on the good teams," the man said. Vito didn't like that. Vito got into personal feuds with other gamblers, according to people who know Vito. And in those early years, Battista probably was not smart enough to realize that Vito didn't care. Vito had plenty of money and lots of people he could get to ride with him. He didn't need Battista, so he kind of left him alone. He was a man of his word. "Battista was basically a thug to Vito," the person close to the situation told me. "He used to steal from Vito," the person said, and Vito just took it. Donaghy moved in with Vito in West Roxbury, in a house with lots of money and horses. One person who knows them well told me that there were numerous young people around the couple. In one of his high-stakes games, Donaghy got to know a man named Jorge who was widely regarded as one of the best of the bookies. That's how he met them, this person said. That's how he met everyone. With that group -- the Donaghy family -- standing around his wife, Tim Donaghy on the court, he was "a big-time gambler," this person said, "a big-time bettor... a big-time player." This is a man who seemed to know all the angles, who, for the period in which he was doing it, was winning more than $10 million on NBA games. And this is a guy who Donaghy's family would lavish with expensive things, like thematic sofas with Donaghy and his wife on the team logo.
